FROM THE EDITOR...

This month, the health care mess is front and center. Should we do nothing until we can all agree upon what to do? Should we do right now what we can all agree upon and work out the rest when we can afford to?

What do you think?

Michael F. Kushner, Editor

WHAT DO WE DO WITH HEALTH CARE?

The health care debate this past year has polarized the country. The general census of opinion from the left, center and right is that Washington is not listening to "We The People."

From the prospective of your Editor, there are certain things that we can all agree upon:

- we ought to be able to buy health insurance across state lines;
- we ought not have our health insurance cancelled because we made a claim;
- we ought to have pricing for the small business and individuals in line with what large companies pay;
- we ought to be able to buy prescription drugs from legitimate pharmacies in other countries, if we choose;
- we ought to be able to change jobs and our health insurance move with us, if we want; and,
- if President Obama can eliminate $500 Billion in Medicare fraud, he ought to do it now.

Again, from the prospective of your Editor, while the country continues its debate on health care, we ought to immediately implement the parts that we all agree should be done.

But, where do we go from here?

- Should the United States government run the health care system similar to what is done in Canada and England?
- Should everyone within the borders of the United States have health care coverage?
- Should everyone within the borders of the United States legally have health care coverage?
- If you believe that everyone in the United States or everyone in the United States legally should have health care coverage, who should pay for the coverage?
- People without insurance know that emergency rooms cannot turn them away and use the ER in place the family doctor. Who should pay for this?
- Except for Medicare and the care provided to veterans, should health care be handled by each individual State?

E-mail us your opinions, thoughts, solutions and rants. We may publish the more thought provoking responses next month. Also, let us know if it is okay to use your name.
